Izvod iz predavanja:

OPINIONS AND EXPERIENCES OF SLOVENIAN FARMERS BEFORE AND AFTER THE ACCESSION OF THE SLOVENIA TO THE EU

Agriculture with its budgetary and policy framework presents one of the largest and most prominent part of the EU functioning. Accordingly, the EU common agricultural policy encompasses a large regulation corpus that guides the everyday life of 12 million of farmers in order to secure the provision of food needs of its population. In 2004 when Slovenia entered into the EU 77.000 farm holdings joined this number. The accession process referring to the compliance with European regulations represented a considerable challenge for the restructuring of Slovenian agriculture particularly due to its socialist legacies. The rigorous changes pertaining to regulation and restructuring of working environment and livelihood conditions of the farm population are to some extent reflected in official statistics e.g. continuous decreasing in the number of farm holdings and concentration of farm land. However, so far not much research interest was devoted to this “transition” process and its effects from the (rural) sociological perspective. The lecture will try to review and mirror the results of some partial research evidences suggesting the heterogeneous experiences of farmers in Slovenia in their way to become the EU farmers.

Dr. Majda Černič Istenič, Ph.D. sociology is Associate Professor of sociology at the University of Ljubljana, Biotechnical Faculty, Agronomy Department and Senior Research Fellow at Research Centre of the Slovenian Academy of Sciences and Arts.
